

Rutland Herald

This is a printer friendly version of an article from www.rutlandherald.com
To print this article open the file menu and choose Print.

Back

Article published Oct 29, 2006

Pupils want 400,000 paper dolls to spotlight Darfur

They're just paper dolls, cut from a hand-drawn pattern, faces drawn in Magic Marker.

But to pupils at one U.S. middle school, they signify the suffering of thousands on the other side of the world in Sudan.

"We were shocked and disturbed to hear about the genocide in Darfur because most of us didn't know what was going on," said Elizabeth Kapnick, an eighth-grader at Elm Place School in Highland Park, Ill. "We wanted to make something that would touch people. ... I figured paper dolls created by children just like the ones in Darfur."

The pupils started cutting and decorating the dolls in spring and soon were giving the patterns to friends and family members.

They now have about 4,000 dolls. Their goal: 400,000 dolls, one for each person who has died in Darfur in the last three years, according to some estimates.

The project began last school year in Cheryl Levi's seventh-grade world cultures class.

Levi teaches a unit on the Holocaust every year, and in that context she discusses contemporary humanitarian crises.

Last school year, the class discussion focused on Darfur. Levi showed videos of actor George Clooney and NBC correspondent Ann Curry visiting the region, and speakers came to the class to lecture on the dire situation there.

Darfur, a region in western Sudan, has been plagued by intertribal disputes over resources such as pastureland and water. In 2003 violence erupted between Sudanese government forces and rebel militias, who accused the government of neglect and discrimination.

In response, the government in Khartoum is alleged to have sent raiding parties to suppress dissent.

Estimates put the death toll between 200,000 and 400,000. An estimated 2 million are living as refugees after fleeing their homes.

When the segment was done, Levi's pupils wanted to learn more. Beyond that, they wanted to do more.

"One student said to me, 'Ms. Levi, we can't be done. We have to do something,'" the teacher recalled. "I said, 'Well, if you come up with an idea, we'll do it.'"

Elizabeth and her classmates put their heads together. They had heard of a project started in 1998 by a Tennessee middle-school class, which set out to collect 11 million paper clips to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust. They eventually collected about 30 million.

The Highland Park pupils settled on paper dolls and dubbed their effort Reach for Change. Pupils started distributing the patterns by e-mail and by hand to friends and relatives, asking them to cut out the dolls, decorate them and send them to the school.

Over the summer, one pupil brought the dolls to summer camp. At a recent meeting, about three dozen pupils gathered in Levi's classroom to toss around ideas. Publicize the effort at the local bank, one said. Take patterns to the doctor's or dentist's office. Take them to nursing homes.

The pupils hope to have 400,000 dolls by their graduation next June and to present them to Sen. Barack

Obama, D-Ill., who has spoken out against the deteriorating situation in Darfur. With about 4,000 stacked in boxes and bins around the classroom and 396,000 to go, the students need to collect about 49,500 dolls per month to reach their goal.

They know it's a tall order, but they also know why it's important.

"What we were thinking was that it was really hard for us to connect with something so far away," said Keren Reichler, 13. "It's hard for people to connect with it, but we're trying to help people with that."

Ada Terman, also 13, said, "An important part of this project is to spread awareness about what's going on, not only to show that people are dying, but to inform people of how they can help."

At the end of another after-school brainstorming session recently, Levi, a teacher for nearly 40 years, beamed about her pupils' efforts. The true goal is not getting 400,000 dolls, she said; it's getting pupils to take it upon themselves to help their community and make a change in the world.

"I'm a teacher who likes to get kids involved in community service, in things where they give back, because we're so lucky to have so much," she said. Collecting all the dolls "would be icing on the cake, but the experience and the journey are the important things."

To learn more, visit: www.nssd112.org/elmp/teachers/Levi/Levi.htm.

Students remember Darfur victims, a paper doll at a time

Illinois middle-schoolers trying to collect 400,000 cutouts to draw attention to genocide crisis in Sudan

By Andrew L. Wang
CHICAGO TRIBUNE
Monday, November 06, 2006

CHICAGO — They're just paper dolls, cut from a hand-drawn pattern, faces drawn in Magic Marker.

But to the students at one U.S. middle school, they signify the suffering of thousands of people on the other side of the world, in Sudan.

"We were shocked and disturbed to hear about the genocide in Darfur because most of us didn't know what was going on," said Elizabeth Kapnick, an eighth-grader at Elm Place School in Highland Park, Ill. "We wanted to make something that would touch people. . . . I figured paper dolls created by children just like the ones in Darfur."

The pupils started cutting and decorating the dolls in the spring and soon were giving the patterns to friends and family members.

They now have about 4,000 dolls. Their goal: 400,000 dolls, one for each person who has died in Darfur in the past three years, according to some estimates.

The project began last school year in Cheryl Levi's seventh-grade world cultures class.

Levi teaches a unit on the Holocaust every year, and in that context she discusses contemporary humanitarian crises. In the past, her classes have learned about the Killing Fields in Cambodia and the campaigns of ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia.

Last school year, the class discussion focused on Darfur, Levi said. She showed videos of actor George Clooney and NBC correspondent Ann Curry visiting the region, and speakers came to the class to lecture on the dire situation there.

Darfur, a region in western Sudan, has been plagued by intertribal disputes about resources such as pastureland and water. In 2003, violence erupted between Sudanese government forces and rebel militias, who accused the government of neglect and discrimination. In response, the government in Khartoum is alleged to have sent raiding parties known as the janjaweed to suppress dissent.

Estimates put the death toll between 200,000 and 400,000. Another estimated 2 million people are living as refugees after fleeing their homes.

When the segment was done, Levi's pupils wanted to learn more. Beyond that, they wanted to do more.

"One student said to me, 'Ms. Levi, we can't be done. We have to do something,'" Levi said. "I said, 'Well, if you come up with an idea, we'll do it.'"

Elizabeth and her classmates put their heads together. They had heard of a project started in 1998 by a Tennessee middle-school class, which set out to collect 11 million paper clips to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust. They eventually collected about 30 million.

The Highland Park pupils settled on paper dolls and dubbed their effort Reach for Change. They distributed the patterns by e-mail and by hand to friends and relatives, asking them to cut out the dolls, decorate them and send them to the school.

Over the summer, one student brought the dolls to summer camp. At a recent meeting, about three dozen pupils gathered in Levi's classroom to toss around ideas. Publicize the effort at the local bank, one said. Take patterns to doctors' or dentists' offices. Take them to nursing homes.

The students, now in eighth grade, hope to have 400,000 dolls by their graduation next June and to present them to U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who has spoken out against the deteriorating situation in Darfur. With about 4,000 dolls stacked in boxes and bins around the classroom and 396,000 to go, the students need to collect about 49,500 dolls per month to reach their goal.

They know it's a tall order, but they also know why it's important.

"What we were thinking was that it was really hard for us to connect with something so far away," said Keren Reichler, 13. "It's hard for people to connect with it, but we're trying to help people with that."

Ada Terman, 13, said, "An important part of this project is to spread awareness about what's going on, not only to show that people are dying, but to inform people of how they can help."

After another recent after-school brainstorming session, Levi, a teacher for nearly 40 years, beamed about her pupils' efforts. The true goal is not getting 400,000 dolls, she said; it's getting students to take it upon themselves to help their community and make a change in the world.

"I'm a teacher who likes to get kids involved in community service, in things where they give back, because we're so lucky to have so much," she said. Collecting all the dolls "would be icing on the cake, but the experience and the journey are the important things."

ON THE WEB: To learn how to send dolls to Reach for Change, visit www.nssd112.org/elmp/teachers/Levi/Levi.htm.

Find this article at:

<http://www.statesman.com/life/content/life/stories/other/11/06/6darfurdolls.html>

 Click to Print

SAVE THIS | EMAIL THIS | Close

Check the box to include the list of links referenced in the article.

Posted on Tue, Oct. 24, 2006

Pupils want 400,000 paper dolls to mark deaths in Darfur

By Andrew L. Wang

Chicago Tribune

(MCT)

CHICAGO - They're just paper dolls, cut from a hand-drawn pattern, faces drawn in Magic Marker.

But to pupils at one U.S. middle school, they signify the suffering of thousands on the other side of the world in Sudan.

"We were shocked and disturbed to hear about the genocide in Darfur because most of us didn't know what was going on," said Elizabeth Kapnick, an 8th grader at Elm Place School in Highland Park, Ill. "We wanted to make something that would touch people. ... I figured paper dolls created by children just like the ones in Darfur."

The pupils started cutting and decorating the dolls in spring and soon were giving the patterns to friends and family members.

They now have about 4,000 dolls. Their goal: 400,000 dolls, one for each person who has died in Darfur in the last three years, according to some estimates.

The project began last school year in Cheryl Levi's 7th grade world cultures class.

Levi teaches a unit on the Holocaust every year, and in that context she discusses contemporary humanitarian crises. In the past, her classes have learned about the Killing Fields in Cambodia and the campaigns of ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia.

Last school year, the class discussion focused on Darfur, Levi said. She showed videos of actor George Clooney and NBC correspondent Ann Curry visiting the region, and speakers came to the class to lecture on the dire situation there.

Darfur, a region in western Sudan, has been plagued by intertribal disputes over resources such as pastureland and water. In 2003 violence erupted between Sudanese government forces and rebel militias, who accused the government of neglect and discrimination. In response, the government in Khartoum is alleged to have sent raiding parties known as the janjaweed to suppress dissent.

Estimates put the death toll between 200,000 and 400,000. Another estimated 2 million are living as refugees after fleeing their homes.

When the segment was done, Levi's pupils wanted to learn more. Beyond that, they wanted to do more.

"One student said to me, `Ms. Levi, we can't be done. We have to do something,'" Levi said. "I said, `Well, if you come up with an idea, we'll do it.'"

Elizabeth and her classmates put their heads together. They had heard of a project started in 1998 by a Tennessee middle-school class, which set out to collect 11 million paper clips to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust. They eventually collected about 30 million.

The Highland Park pupils settled on paper dolls and dubbed their effort Reach for Change. Pupils started distributing the patterns by e-mail and by hand to friends and relatives, asking them to cut out the dolls, decorate them and send them to the school.

Over the summer, one pupil brought the dolls to summer camp. At a recent meeting, about three dozen pupils gathered in Levi's classroom to toss around ideas. Publicize the effort at the local bank, one said. Take patterns to the doctor's or dentist's office. Take them to nursing homes.

The pupils, now in 8th grade, hope to have 400,000 dolls by their graduation next June and to present them to U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who has spoken out against the deteriorating situation in Darfur. With about 4,000 stacked in boxes and bins around the classroom and 396,000 to go, the students need to collect about 49,500 dolls per month to reach their goal.

They know it's a tall order, but they also know why it's important.

"What we were thinking was that it was really hard for us to connect with something so far away," said Keren Reichler, 13. "It's hard for people to connect with it, but we're trying to help people with that."

Ada Terman, also 13, said, "An important part of this project is to spread awareness about what's going on, not only to show that people are dying, but to inform people of how they can help."

On a recent afternoon, after another after-school brainstorming session, Levi, a teacher for nearly 40 years, beamed about her pupils' efforts. The true goal is not getting 400,000 dolls, she said; it's getting pupils to take it upon themselves to help their community and make a change in the world.

"I'm a teacher who likes to get kids involved in community service, in things where they give back, because we're so lucky to have so much," she said. Collecting all the dolls "would be icing on the cake, but the experience and the journey are the important things."

Ian Iyengar, 13, takes these lessons to heart. In his spare time, he goes to youth centers and nursing homes to sing songs, play his drum and talk about Darfur.

During the Reach for Change meeting that afternoon, his selection was a tune by singer Ben Harper. A touch of nerves in his voice, he sang:

I can change the world

With my own two hands.

Make a better place

With my own two hands.

Make a kinder place

With my own two hands.

With my own,

With my own two hands.

ON THE WEB

To learn more, visit: www.nssd112.org/elmplace/teachers/Levi/Levi.htm

<http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/local/chicago/chi-0610190042oct19,1,2655866.story?coll=chi-newslocalchicago-hed&ctrack=1&cse>

Youths' creations symbolize suffering

Pupils want 400,000 paper dolls to mark deaths in Darfur

By Andrew L. Wang
Tribune staff reporter

Advertisement

October 19, 2006

They're just paper dolls, cut from a hand-drawn pattern, faces drawn in Magic Marker.

But to pupils at a Highland Park middle school, they signify the suffering of thousands on the other side of the world in Sudan.

"We were shocked and disturbed to hear about the genocide in Darfur because most of us didn't know what was going on," said Elizabeth Kapnick, an 8th grader at Elm Place School. "We wanted to make something that would touch people. ... I figured paper dolls created by children just like the ones in Darfur."

The pupils started cutting and decorating the dolls in spring and soon were giving the patterns to friends and family members.

They now have about 4,000 dolls. Their goal: 400,000 dolls, one for each person who has died in Darfur in the last three years, according to some estimates.

The project began last school year in Cheryl Levi's 7th grade world cultures class.

Levi teaches a unit on the Holocaust every year, and in that context she discusses contemporary humanitarian crises. In the past, her classes have learned about the Killing Fields in Cambodia and the campaigns of ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia.

Last school year, the class discussion focused on Darfur, Levi said. She showed videos of actor George Clooney and NBC correspondent Ann Curry visiting the region, and speakers came to the class to lecture on the dire situation there.

Darfur, a region in western Sudan, has been plagued by intertribal disputes over resources such as pastureland and water. In 2003 violence erupted between Sudanese government forces and rebel militias, who accused the government of neglect and discrimination. In response, the government in Khartoum is alleged to have sent raiding parties known as the janjaweed to suppress dissent.

Estimates put the death toll between 200,000 and 400,000. Another estimated 2 million are living as refugees after fleeing their homes.

When the segment was done, Levi's pupils wanted to learn more. Beyond that, they wanted to do more.

"One student said to me, 'Ms. Levi, we can't be done. We have to do something,'" Levi said. "I said, 'Well, if you come up with an idea, we'll do it.'"

Elizabeth and her classmates put their heads together. They had heard of a project started in 1998 by a Tennessee middle-school class, which set out to collect 11 million paper clips to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust. They eventually collected about 30 million.

Reach for Change

The Highland Park pupils settled on paper dolls and dubbed their effort Reach for Change. Pupils started distributing the patterns by e-mail and by hand to friends and relatives, asking them to cut out the dolls, decorate them and send them to the school.

Over the summer, one pupil brought the dolls to summer camp. At a recent meeting, about three dozen pupils gathered in Levi's classroom to toss around ideas. Publicize the effort at the local bank, one said. Take patterns to the doctor's or dentist's office. Take them to nursing homes.

The pupils, now in 8th grade, hope to have 400,000 dolls by their graduation next June and to present them to U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who has spoken out against the deteriorating situation in Darfur. With about 4,000 stacked in boxes and bins around the classroom and 396,000 to go, the students need to collect about 49,500 dolls per month to reach their goal.

They know it's a tall order, but they also know why it's important.

"What we were thinking was that it was really hard for us to connect with something so far away," said Keren Reichler, 13. "It's hard for people to connect with it, but we're trying to help people with that."

Ada Terman, also 13, said, "An important part of this project is to spread awareness about what's going on, not only to show that people are dying, but to inform people of how they can help."

The real goal

On a recent afternoon, after another after-school brainstorming session, Levi, a teacher for nearly 40 years, beamed about her pupils' efforts. The true goal is not getting 400,000 dolls, she said; it's getting pupils to take it upon themselves to help their community and make a change in the world.

"I'm a teacher who likes to get kids involved in community service, in things where they give back, because we're so lucky to have so much," she said. Collecting all the dolls "would be icing on the cake, but the experience and the journey are the important things."

Ian Iyengar, 13, takes these lessons to heart. In his spare time, he goes to youth centers and nursing homes to sing songs, play his drum and talk about Darfur.

During the Reach for Change meeting that afternoon, his selection was a tune by singer Ben Harper. A touch of nerves in his voice, he sang:

I can change the world

With my own two hands.

Make a better place

With my own two hands.

Make a kinder place

With my own two hands.

With my own,

With my own two hands.

- - -

On the Web

To learn more, visit: www.nssd112.org/elmplace/teachers/Levi/Levi.htm

Copyright © 2007, Chicago Tribune

commercialappeal.com - Memphis, TN

To print this page, select File then Print from your browser

URL: http://www.commercialappeal.com/mca/lifestyle/article/0,1426,MCA_521_5093177,00.html

Paper protest for Darfur

Schoolchildren create a memorial to mark genocide

By Andrew L. Wang
Chicago Tribune
October 26, 2006

CHICAGO -- They're just paper dolls, cut from a hand-drawn pattern, faces drawn in Magic Marker.

But to pupils at one U.S. middle school, they signify the suffering of thousands on the other side of the world in Sudan.

"We were shocked and disturbed to hear about the genocide in Darfur because most of us didn't know what was going on," said Elizabeth Kapnick, an eighth-grader at Elm Place School in Highland Park, Ill. "We wanted to make something that would touch people. ... I figured paper dolls created by children just like the ones in Darfur."

The pupils started cutting and decorating the dolls in spring and soon were giving the patterns to friends and family members.

They now have about 4,000 dolls. Their goal: 400,000 dolls, one for each person who has died in Darfur in the last three years, according to some estimates.

The project began last school year in Cheryl Levi's seventh-grade world cultures class.

Levi teaches a unit on the Holocaust every year, and in that context she discusses contemporary humanitarian crises. In the past, her classes have learned about the Killing Fields in Cambodia and the campaigns of ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia. Last school year, the class discussion focused on Darfur, Levi said. She showed videos of actor George Clooney and NBC correspondent Ann Curry visiting the region, and speakers came to the class to lecture on the dire situation there.

Darfur, a region in western Sudan, has been plagued by intertribal disputes over resources such as pastureland and water. In 2003 violence erupted between Sudanese government forces and rebel militias, who accused the government of neglect and discrimination. In response, the government in Khartoum is alleged to have sent raiding parties known as the janjaweed to suppress dissent.

Estimates put the death toll between 200,000 and 400,000. Another estimated 2 million are living as refugees after fleeing their homes.

When the segment was done, Levi's pupils wanted to learn more. Beyond that, they wanted to do more.

"One student said to me, 'Ms. Levi, we can't be done. We have to do something,' " Levi said. "I said, 'Well, if you come up with an idea, we'll do it.' "

Elizabeth and her classmates put their heads together. They had heard of a project started in 1998 by a Tennessee middle-school class, which collected paper clips to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust. They eventually collected about 30 million.

The Highland Park pupils settled on paper dolls and dubbed their effort Reach for Change. Pupils started distributing the patterns by e-mail and by hand to friends and relatives, asking them to cut out the dolls, decorate them and send them to the school.

Over the summer, one student brought the dolls to summer camp. At a recent meeting, about three dozen students gathered in Levi's classroom to toss around ideas. Publicize the effort at the local bank, one said. Take patterns to the doctor's or dentist's office. Take them to nursing homes.

The pupils, now in eighth grade, hope to have 400,000 dolls by their graduation next June and to present them to U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who has spoken out against the deteriorating situation in Darfur. With about 4,000 stacked in boxes and bins around the classroom and 396,000 to go, the students need to collect about 49,500 dolls per month to reach their goal.

They know it's a tall order, but they also know why it's important.

"What we were thinking was that it was really hard for us to connect with something so far away," said Keren Reichler, 13. "It's hard for people to connect with it, but we're trying to help people with that."

Ada Terman, also 13, said, "An important part of this project is to spread awareness about what's going on, not only to show that people are dying, but to inform people of how they can help."

On a recent afternoon, after another after-school brainstorming session, Levi, a teacher for nearly 40 years, beamed about her students' efforts. The true goal is not getting 400,000 dolls, she said; it's getting pupils to take it upon themselves to help their community and make a change in the world.

"I'm a teacher who likes to get kids involved in community service, in things where they give back, because we're so lucky to have so much," she said. Collecting all the dolls "would be icing on the cake, but the experience and the journey are the important things."

Ian Iyengar, 13, takes these lessons to heart. In his spare time, he goes to youth centers and nursing homes to sing songs, play his drum and talk about Darfur.

During the Reach for Change meeting that afternoon, his selection was a tune by singer Ben Harper. A touch of nerves in his voice, he sang:

I can change the world

With my own two hands.

Make a better place

With my own two hands.

Make a kinder place

With my own two hands.

With my own,

Chicago Tribune

Elm Place eighth-graders cut out paper dolls in Highland Park, Ill. The students hope to cut and collect 400,000 paper dolls to represent victims of genocide in Darfur.

With my own two hands.

Find out more

Visit nssd112.org/elmpplace/teachers/Levi/Levi.htm

Copyright 2006, commercialappeal.com - Memphis, TN. All Rights Reserved.

Back to regular view • Print this page

COMMUNITY BRIEFS

(<http://www.pioneerlocal.com/highlandpark/news/137695,HP-newsbriefs-111606-s1.article>)

November 16, 2006

Lecture at library Dec. 3 to tackle Israeli issues

Yigal Bronner will present "Behind Walls, the Israeli Barrier Project and its Impact," followed by a discussion, at 2 p.m. Dec. 3 at the Highland Park Public Library.

He is a member of Ta'Ayush, an Israeli-Palestinian partnership. He is a conscientious objector and was sentenced to prison for refusing to serve in the occupied territories. His political commentary has appeared in The Nation magazine and in books such as "The Other Israel: Voices of Refusal and Dissent" and "The Politics of Anti-Semitism."

Our Town Highwood sets holiday party

Our Town Highwood will host its annual holiday party "Mangia, Mangia" at 6 p.m. Dec. 1 at Victoria of Highwood at Green Bay Road and Washington Street. Family style meals are served at 7 p.m.

Tickets are available at $25 per person directly from Our Town Highwood members or by check to Our Town Highwood, P.O. Box 66, Highwood, Ill., 60040. More information is at mangiamangia1@hotmail.com, password "outtown" or by voice mail at (847) 433-3330. Ticket sales will be stopped Nov. 28 because last year's event was over-sold.

Proceeds from "Mangia, Mangia" will help Our Town Highwood, especially those directed toward the interests of children.

Students collect slew of cut-out paper dolls

Seventh-grade students at Elm Place School are collecting 400,000 cut-out paper dolls as part of their "Reach for Change" project to help them understand the magnitude of the loss of life in Darfur, Sudan in Africa.

To help reach the goal to create so many paper dolls, customers of Eyeland of St. Johns are being asked to make cut-outs and to display them in the store's windows. The goal is to fill both windows by the end of November.

Students have asked that a penny be attached to each doll.

Students plan to present 400,000 paper dolls to U.S. Senator Barack Obama, D-Ill., actor George Clooney or a representative of either one of them, at the school's June, 2007 eighth-grade graduation ceremonies.

Patterns for the "Reach for Change" doll are available at Eyeland, 1819 St. Johns Avenue, Highland Park. Participants can color, cut out, attach the donation and leave it at Eyeland.

© Copyright 2006 Sun-Times News Group | User Agreement and Privacy Policy

Published: Wednesday October 25, 2006

McCLATCHY-TRIBUNE PHOTO/JIM ROBINSON

Elm Place eighth-graders are cutting out paper dolls in Highland Park, Ill., to represent victims of genocide in Darfur.

Pupils make dolls to mark deaths in Darfur

By ANDREW L. WANG
McCLATCHY-TRIBUNE

CHICAGO - They're just paper dolls, cut from a hand-drawn pattern, faces drawn in Magic Marker.

But to pupils at one U.S. middle school, they signify the suffering of thousands on the other side of the world in Sudan.

"We were shocked and disturbed to hear about the genocide in Darfur because most of us didn't know what was going on," said Elizabeth Kapnick, an eighth-grader at Elm Place School in Highland Park, Ill. "We wanted to make something that would touch people. . . . I figured paper dolls created by children just like the ones in Darfur."

The pupils started cutting and decorating the dolls in spring and soon were giving the patterns to friends and family members.

They now have about 4,000 dolls. Their goal: 400,000 dolls, one for each person who has died in Darfur in the last three years, according to some estimates.

The project began last school year in Cheryl Levi's seventh-grade world cultures class.

Levi teaches a unit on the Holocaust every year, and in that context she discusses contemporary humanitarian crises. In the past, her classes have learned about the killing fields in Cambodia and the campaigns of ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia.

Last school year, the class discussion focused on Darfur, Levi said. She showed videos of actor George Clooney and NBC correspondent Ann Curry visiting the region, and speakers came to the class to lecture on the dire situation there.

Darfur, a region in western Sudan, has been plagued by intertribal disputes over resources such as pastureland and water. In 2003 violence erupted between Sudanese government forces and rebel militias, who accused the government of neglect and discrimination. In response, the government in Khartoum is alleged to have sent raiding parties known as the janjaweed to suppress dissent.

Estimates put the death toll between 200,000 and 400,000. Another estimated 2 million are living as refugees after fleeing their homes.

When the segment was done, Levi's pupils wanted to learn more. Beyond that, they wanted to do more.

"One student said to me, 'Ms. Levi, we can't be done. We have to do something,' " Levi said. "I said, 'Well, if you come up with an idea, we'll do it.' "

Elizabeth and her classmates put their heads together. They had heard of a project started in 1998 by a Tennessee middle-school class, which set out to collect 11 million paper clips to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust. They eventually collected about 30 million.

The Highland Park pupils settled on paper dolls and dubbed their effort Reach for Change. Pupils started distributing the patterns by e-mail and by hand to friends and relatives, asking them to cut out the dolls, decorate them and send them to the school.

Over the summer, one pupil brought the dolls to summer camp. At a recent meeting, about three dozen pupils gathered in Levi's classroom to toss around ideas. Publicize the effort at the local bank, one said. Take patterns to the doctor's or dentist's office. Take them to nursing homes.

The pupils, now in eighth grade, hope to have 400,000 dolls by their graduation next June and to present them to U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-III.), who has spoken out against the deteriorating situation in Darfur. With about 4,000 stacked in boxes and bins around the classroom and 396,000 to go, the students need to collect about 49,500 dolls per month to reach their goal.

They know it's a tall order, but they also know why it's important.

"What we were thinking was that it was really hard for us to connect with something so far away," said Keren Reichler, 13. "It's hard for people to connect with it, but we're trying to help people with that."

Ada Terman, also 13, said, "An important part of this project is to spread awareness about what's going on, not only to show that people are dying, but to inform people of how they can help."

On a recent afternoon, after another after-school brainstorming session, Levi, a teacher for nearly 40 years, beamed about her pupils' efforts. The true goal is not getting 400,000 dolls, she said; it's getting pupils to take it upon themselves to help their community and make a change in the world.

"I'm a teacher who likes to get kids involved in community service, in things where they give back, because we're so lucky to have so much," she said. Collecting all the dolls "would be icing on the cake, but the experience and the journey are the important things."

©1996-2006The Pueblo Chieftain Online

Times Argus

This is a printer friendly version of an article from www.timesargus.com

To print this article open the file menu and choose Print.

Back

Article published Oct 29, 2006

Pupils want 400,000 paper dolls to spotlight Darfur

They're just paper dolls, cut from a hand-drawn pattern, faces drawn in Magic Marker.

But to pupils at one U.S. middle school, they signify the suffering of thousands on the other side of the world in Sudan.

"We were shocked and disturbed to hear about the genocide in Darfur because most of us didn't know what was going on," said Elizabeth Kapnick, an eighth-grader at Elm Place School in Highland Park, Ill. "We wanted to make something that would touch people. ... I figured paper dolls created by children just like the ones in Darfur."

The pupils started cutting and decorating the dolls in spring and soon were giving the patterns to friends and family members.

They now have about 4,000 dolls. Their goal: 400,000 dolls, one for each person who has died in Darfur in the last three years, according to some estimates.

The project began last school year in Cheryl Levi's seventh-grade world cultures class.

Levi teaches a unit on the Holocaust every year, and in that context she discusses contemporary humanitarian crises.

Last school year, the class discussion focused on Darfur. Levi showed videos of actor George Clooney and NBC correspondent Ann Curry visiting the region, and speakers came to the class to lecture on the dire situation there.

Darfur, a region in western Sudan, has been plagued by intertribal disputes over resources such as pastureland and water. In 2003 violence erupted between Sudanese government forces and rebel militias, who accused the government of neglect and discrimination.

In response, the government in Khartoum is alleged to have sent raiding parties to suppress dissent.

Estimates put the death toll between 200,000 and 400,000. An estimated 2 million are living as refugees after fleeing their homes.

When the segment was done, Levi's pupils wanted to learn more. Beyond that, they wanted to do more.

"One student said to me, 'Ms. Levi, we can't be done. We have to do something,'" the teacher recalled. "I said, 'Well, if you come up with an idea, we'll do it.'"

Elizabeth and her classmates put their heads together. They had heard of a project started in 1998 by a Tennessee middle-school class, which set out to collect 11 million paper clips to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust. They eventually collected about 30 million.

The Highland Park pupils settled on paper dolls and dubbed their effort Reach for Change. Pupils started distributing the patterns by e-mail and by hand to friends and relatives, asking them to cut out the dolls, decorate them and send them to the school.

Over the summer, one pupil brought the dolls to summer camp. At a recent meeting, about three dozen pupils gathered in Levi's classroom to toss around ideas. Publicize the effort at the local bank, one said. Take patterns to the doctor's or dentist's office. Take them to nursing homes.

The pupils hope to have 400,000 dolls by their graduation next June and to present them to Sen. Barack

Obama, D-Ill., who has spoken out against the deteriorating situation in Darfur. With about 4,000 stacked in boxes and bins around the classroom and 396,000 to go, the students need to collect about 49,500 dolls per month to reach their goal.

They know it's a tall order, but they also know why it's important.

"What we were thinking was that it was really hard for us to connect with something so far away," said Keren Reichler, 13. "It's hard for people to connect with it, but we're trying to help people with that."

Ada Terman, also 13, said, "An important part of this project is to spread awareness about what's going on, not only to show that people are dying, but to inform people of how they can help."

At the end of another after-school brainstorming session recently, Levi, a teacher for nearly 40 years, beamed about her pupils' efforts. The true goal is not getting 400,000 dolls, she said; it's getting pupils to take it upon themselves to help their community and make a change in the world.

"I'm a teacher who likes to get kids involved in community service, in things where they give back, because we're so lucky to have so much," she said. Collecting all the dolls "would be icing on the cake, but the experience and the journey are the important things."

To learn more, visit: www.nssd112.org/elmp/teachers/Levi/Levi.htm.
